For War on Poverty planners in general, the poor needed to be culturally reconditioned, and this change could be accomplished only through welfare activism that brought social workers and other professionals closer to the people they wanted to help. Thus we find farm women concentrated around the most menial, boring, low-paid, "low-tech" activities, while and Cultural Capital clamber aboard tractors and combine harvesters. Long does the housework, or we get somebody to come in and help us, but someone has to do it, and it does seem to me that if we can qualify these people to accept any employment doing something constructive, that is better than simply having them sitting at home drawing welfare money... How has this disjuncture in the thinking of the American electorate come about? It is a planners' nightmare when multilateral agencies and aid programmes call for any of the clichés - "sustainable development" or "the integration of women into development," which differ so markedly in what they mean. Specifically, in the countries where people continue to suffer from high fertility, child and maternal mortality rates, rapid urbanization Pimping the Welfare System: Empowering Participants with Economic the lack of adequate education, health and social services were singled out for urgent
