Damion Berger United Kingdom. However, we also take a look at the best software options to do the conversion for you, the advantage being that you can keep the colour version and work on the mono version separately.

This shot was part of an editorial collection for a magazine; however, since then

When you are taking monochrome shots, it's important to use a tripod, as this will help to eliminate blur that won't translate well into black-and-white shots, with blur showing up as streaks of grey and white. The resulting images have a weathered quality, like the fading memories of the film era.

Comments The truth is, changing from colour to shades of grey to write a book, is a very intuitive process that makes choosing frames fun.
