In this regard, the committee noted the strong potential of studies designed to test the effectiveness of interventions aimed at reducing the level of constructs that have been found to mediate associations between depression in parents and outcomes in children, for example, particular aspects of parenting. Belsky, J. GetListedToday. The studies reveal well-replicated findings on the relation between parental depression and impaired parenting for children from infancy and even fetal development through adolescence. With regard to genetics, there is a clear genetic risk for depression, as reviewed in Chapter 3.
